Course title

Political Philosophy.

Topics and course structure

The course aims at analyzing the idea of justice as a both formal and practical matter, as well as moral sentiments and negative emotions (such as anger, especially following the pandemic crisis). Therefore, normative notions conceptualized by political and social philosophy (such as like the idea of citizenship, human rights, fundamental freedoms, equality) will be presented, as well as forms of violation (such as social exclusion, political and domestic violence, marginalization), which prevents the free development of human capabilities, will be analyzed. This kind of knowledge is basic for the formation and training of future social workers, who have to be able to let interact foundational principles with professional practices.

Objectives

The teaching program aims at analyzing fundamental concepts, which lie at the basis of political theory and play a crucial role for the education and training of social workers.

The theoretical perspective of political and social philosophy is in fact fundamental for those who intend to understand and apply deontological principles, the foundations of human rights, the respect for fundamental freedoms, especially when they are denied, creating inequalities and discrimination.

The course intends to highlight the question of human rights and the idea of citizenship as transformed over time, especially in relation to social norms and social policies, social workers have to respect and apply. For this reason, during the lectures in class and the exercises online, concept will be analyzed, referring to practical examples or specific case studies.

The course will be divided into a part devoted to lectures and a part of individual and group exercises related to the topics under consideration.

Students have to be able to relate theoretical knowledge with practical models, to apply concepts to empirical realities and vice-versa.

Methodologies

Due to the pandemic crisis, the course will be totally online.

The course will last 56 hours:

- 40 hours will consist of lectures and
- 16 of exercises with a tutor.

The course includes: lectures, analysis of case studies, interventions by experts, individual exercises and group work in order to to deepen the topics under examination thanks to a tutor.

Students who will take part in the working groups will be meant as “attending students” and the study of a part of the books indicated in the program will be reduced.

Online and offline teaching materials

Social work profession is often understood as a merely “practical” activity, which is mainly related to experiential knowledge and the application of norms.

Vice-versa, this profession cannot be fully understood and practiced without the support of theoretical reflections and analytic instruments, which can contribute to orientate deontological behaviours, decisions and choices, mainly when social workers have to face difficult cases in problematic situations and in a short time.

The course will be developed through lectures and online exercises. The lessons will examine the different models of citizenship and the idea of human rights, as well as examples that indicate their violation. The exercises include individual and group work, will be focused on specific case studies.

Additional work material (also in English) related to the different activities of the course will be provided by the instructor during the lectures or the exercises.

Programme and references for attending students

Students who will enroll and take part in the working groups will be meant as “attending students” and the study of a part of the books indicated in the program will be reduced.

The entire program will be presented at the beginning of the course.
