Marketing Urbano

Learning objectives

Contents

The course aims to put forward a possible critical analysis of urban marketing policies. Starting from a historical review of the debate on this issue and on the main theories that have characterized the discussion from the 80s onwards, the course will attempt to highlight the challenges and new trends that the urban marketing strategies of the new millennium need to take into account.

Detailed program

In between the late 70's and early 80's, many cities / capitals of advanced economies faced severe economic crisis coupled with a critical contraction of Fordist manufacturing systems. Local governments have been forced to develop entrepreneurship strategies (Harvey 1989) that would be able to rethink the attractiveness of their cities. Urban marketing policies have become tools to revitalize local economies, attract new populations (tourists, talents and residents) and stimulate investments (national and international economic capitals) (Kavaratzis, 2004). However, it should not be forgotten that the urban attractiveness also triggered mechanisms of social and territorial exclusion, exacerbating the effects of gentrification and festivalisation processes within cities. The social, economic, demographic and technological transformations of the new millennium pose new questions and new themes for territorial marketing. The ever-increasing role of local communities, radical changes in the media and the hyper-diversity of contemporary society are shaping co-production strategies of urban marketing, which increasingly have a micro-territorial focus.

The course will therefore focus on five macro areas of interest:

1. The debate on urban marketing policies: concepts, strategies and actions

2. The role of the place in urban marketing policies
3. Urban marketing and local communities: co-production of the image
4. From urban marketing to urban micro marketing: the revenge of the neighborhoods
5. New communication tools for urban co-marketing
