Course title

Philosophy and Philosophical Practices: City, World, Cosmos

Topics and course structure

What is the relationship between life and thought according to ancient Greek philosophy? How are philosophy, action (praxis), and experience (in its both ordinary and properly spiritual dimensions) intertwined in this beginning? How are we to understand the human being as the fruit of an architectonic, formative process?

This course focuses on philosophy as a body of formative practices and philosophical-spiritual exercises. In the systematizations of the late ancient schools as well as the Platonic-Aristotelian and pre-Socratic reflection, philosophy understood in its essentially practical dimension casts light on the crucial problems of pedagogical processes and therapeutic relationships alike. This year we shall focus in particular on the relation between the human condition and the natural and cosmic environment.

Objectives

Developing: 1) reading and interpretive abilities; 2) capacity for autonomous articulation; 3) critical and dialectical skills; 4) self-awareness and formative abilities; 5) listening and dialogical ability in pedagogical/analytical context.

Methodologies
