Short description

Objectives

The evolution of digital technologies and their pervasiveness pose new challenges to research communication. New languages and an unprecedented space-time reshape the contexts within which it is increasingly necessary to convey and share research results, as well as research practice itself, to a wide and heterogeneous audience. By analysing concrete cases, developing simulations and setting up micro-projects, the course, conducted mainly in a laboratory and cooperative mode, aims to provide the most immersive and participatory experience possible of a multimodal communication capable of increasingly making research (and not only scientific research) a shared heritage, a new horizon within which to rethink the very concept of citizenship.
