2425-4-A5810043

Learning objectives

Provide knowledge of media law.

Contents

Information and communication law constitutes a classic discipline within legal studies, which has been enriched over time with new themes and issues critical to democracies.

The introductory part will be dedicated to the regulation and limits of the freedom of speech in the Italian Constitution, in international declarations of rights, and in the European Union, with particular regard to the relationship between information and democracy.

Next, the legal framework governing mass media (press, radio, television, cinema, new media, and the internet) and the regulation of the bodies operating within the communication system will be analyzed.

Special attention will be devoted to several current topics: the right to report, criticize, and satirize; judicial information; the protection of personal data, the right to be forgotten, and personal identity; opinion crimes; the journalistic profession and the protection of sources; television pluralism and political propaganda; the internet; commercial advertising; copyright.

The course has a monographic and seminar format. In addition to lectures, it includes research and readings conducted by the students.

Assessment will also be based on the work carried out within the course, with particular attention to active participation in discussions. Special attention will be given to legal cases from Italian jurisprudence and the European Court of Human Rights.
