Short description

This course introduces the economics of education, emphasizing microeconomic theories related to investment in and returns from education and training. It explores the application of econometric methods to study key educational issues, with a focus on causal inference to uncover the effects of individual choices in human capital investment.

Students will engage with rigorous economic arguments and empirical evidence to evaluate various human capital policies, with special attention to investments in tertiary education (e.g., college choice and further education) and training from both individual and firm perspectives.

The course delves into contemporary theories on skill formation over the life cycle, including intergenerational transmission, the role of multiple skills, and the technology of skill formation. It also examines the gender dimensions of educational investment, fostering a comprehensive understanding of the subject.

Reading list

*Lecture 1: Becker vs. Spence - Competing Theories of Human Capital

Focus:

Becker's Human Capital Theory: Education as an investment in skills and productivity.

Spence's Signaling Theory: Education as a signal to employers about an individual's innate ability.

Critique and synthesis of the two models in modern labor economics.

Key Readings:
